The specifick gravity of pure mercury is to water as 14020 to 1000, and as it is the heaviest of all fluids, it is also the coldest, and when heated the hottest; the ancients all esteemed quicksilver a poison, nor was it brought into internal use till about two hundred and twenty years ago, which was first occasioned by the shepherds, who ventured to give it their sheep to kill worms, and as they received no hurt by it, it was soon concluded, that men might take it safely: in time, the diggers in the mines, when they found it crude, swallowed it in vast quantities, in order to sell it privately, when they had voided it by stool: but the miners seldom follow their occupation above three or four years, and the artificers, who have much dealing in it, are generally seized with paralytick disorders. Hill.

S.

S Has in Engliſh the ſame hiſſing ſound as in other languages, and unhappily prevails in ſo many of our words that it produces in the ear of a foreigner a continued ſibilation. In the beginning of words it has invariably its natural and genuine ſound: in the middle it is ſometimes uttered with a ſtronger appulſe of the tongue to the palate, like z, as raſe, reſcate, roſy, oſier, noſel, reſident, buſy, buſineſs. It ſometimes keeps its natural ſound; as looſe, deſignation; for which I know not whether any rules can be given. In the end of monoſyllables it is ſometimes s, as in this; and ſometimes z, as in as, has; and generally where es ſtands in verbs for eth, as gives. It ſeems to be eſtabliſhed as a rule, that no noun ſingular ſhould end with ſ ſingle: therefore in words written with diphthongs, and naturally long, an e is nevertheleſs added at the end, as gooſe, houſe; and where the ſyllable is ſhort the ſ is doubled, and was once ſſe, as aſs, anciently aſſe; wilderneſs, anciently wilderneſſe; diſtreſs, anciently diſtreſſe.
